Optimising Farm Systems – How Integrating Farm Forestry is Economically and Environmentally Strengthening the Farming Industry

With our continual work to improve farming environmental footprints, we have discovered some strategic solutions using forestry for farmers to significantly reduce farm level carbon footprints, while actually increasing economic performance, sustainability and biodiversity through optimising land uses.

Join The AgriBusiness Group's free Canterbury Carbon Farming seminars on how to optimise your farm system through land use diversification with integrated farm forestry and carbon farming.

If you're a hill country farmer that has areas of steep terrain, integrated carbon farming is proving to be extremely successful at optimising farm systems. Carbon farming, like all investments, has associated risks and opportunities. Join us at one of our free seminars to learn how integrating farm forestry can unlock the full economic and environmental potential and future protection of your farm system

Seminar Locations 2021 (register below for location details)

Banks Peninsula, 8th March
Cheviot, 15th March
Seddon, 15th March
Waiau, 17th March

What is Carbon Farming?

- Conversion of poorer quality areas of steep land into a more productive land use of permanent or production forest (e.g. radiata pine, douglas fir, eucalypts, manuka, or native indigenous)
- Pole plantings around steep areas prone to soil erosion (e.g. poplars and willows)

What are the opportunities?

- Diversified revenue streams, financial resilience and stronger farming business model
- Generate far greater returns on poor, steep, hill country than conventional farming
- Improved freshwater quality (N, P, and sediment) and biodiversity
- Carbon neutral farming footprint

In the current climate, the opportunity to create some diversity in your farming systems is becoming increasingly important. As a farmer this means understanding your land and where those areas are so that you can optimise your land use to be able to supplement, support, and boost your farm's primary goal of food and fibre production. Land use capability (LUC) mapping allows for the identification of marginal and less productive areas of land. Having done this, you can assess those poorer producing areas and then assess the cost-benefit of other land uses, in this case forestry (native and/or exotic). The assessment compares the long-term economic potential of each land use and the associated environmental affects (carbon footprint, biodiversity, and freshwater). The AgriBusiness Group have undertaken several case studies using LUC mapping with the outcome for the farmer and the environment being strong. We are encouraging farmers and industry to look in the same direction for a solution to maintaining profitable farms that are sustainable in their production.

During this process, the three key outcomes for farm's undertaking land use change have been:

A): More profitable, stronger farm systems – carbon and timber are long term, lucrative sources of farm income that return far greater on LUC7+ country than red meat food and fibre. Integrating other land uses in some or all of these areas strengthen the farm revenue through diversification (e.g. carbon, honey, or timber), to support the highs and lows of red meat and other farm systems. This also allows farmers to shift their focus on farming animals onto the more productive areas of the farms.

B): Carbon neutral farming and climate change resilience – by 2025, all farms will require their carbon footprint to be calculated and managed accordingly. As forestry is a carbon positive activity, only small amounts are typically required to offset sheep and beef farm systems, or even higher emitters, such as dairy or dairy support. By registering those forests into the ETS, farmers are assisting New Zealand, and even the globe, at achieving crucial climate change targets through sequestration.

C): Maximised farm sustainability and biodiversity – understanding your farming land use capability allows you to optimise the land to its greatest potential. The process of this naturally means a more sustainable land use which promotes the regeneration and growth of on farm environmental and ecological values. With that comes increased biodiversity in the form of native fauna, flora, and soil organisms through habitat establishment and protection

Level 2

Back to Level 2!!!

Thank you for your continued understanding during the changes with delivery of your healthcare.

Level changes are more frequent than any of us would like, but we must follow guidelines and take precautions. There will be some changes in practice and we respectfully ask patients to adhere to advice given. Hopefully, things will stabilise again soon.

If you have any respiratory, flu/cold like symptoms, sore throat, or cough, please still phone in advance to arrange an appointment, we will still triage in the normal way to continue to reduce the chance of infection. For patients presenting with these symptoms please do not enter the Health Centre when you arrive for your appointment but phone first to let reception know you have arrived, and they will direct you to where you will be seen.

We will continue to update the community with any changes when they arise.

If you are unsure or have any questions, please ring the Health Centre to talk to the receptionist or the practice nurse.
