Pool Party

by Kelly Hashway

"Here you go," Melanie said, handing Ava an envelope.

"Thanks," Ava said. "But what is it?"

"An invitation to my pool party. It's Saturday at two."

Melanie kept talking but Ava wasn't listening. The words pool party echoed through her mind. Ava couldn't swim. Every time she tried to learn she'd wind up with water up her nose and she'd be out of the pool as quickly as possible.

"You're coming, right?" Melanie said.

"Huh?" Ava jumped.

"Do you think you could come a little early? I could use your help inflating the floating basketball hoops and the ball."

Ava didn't know what to say. Melanie was one of her best friends. She couldn't miss her party. But she didn't want the whole school to find out she couldn't swim. "I think I might be busy this Saturday." Ava saw the disappointment on Melanie's face. "Maybe I could stop by for a little while, but I definitely wouldn't have time to swim."

Ava spent the rest of the school day dodging Melanie's questions about what she had to do on Saturday and why she couldn't stay for the whole party. Ava felt awful. That night she begged her parents to ground her or make other plans so she couldn't go to Melanie's party.

"Ava, this is silly," her mother said. "Melanie is your friend. She won't care that you can't swim."

Ava wasn't so sure.

"Just be honest with Melanie," her father said.

When Saturday arrived, Ava's parents drove her to the party right on time. They had even convinced her to wear her bathing suit under her clothes.

"You don't have to go in the water, but you might get splashed," her mother insisted.

Melanie ran up to Ava the moment she stepped out of the car. "You made it! The party would've been ruined if you weren't here."

Ava's stomach lurched. Melanie was a good friend and she deserved the truth. "Mel, I have to tell you something. I didn't really have other plans. I was just afraid to tell you that... I can't swim."

Melanie smiled. "Perfect! We won't have to fight over who will be referee of the pool games. No one ever wants to get out of the water to do it."

Ava nodded. "I could do that. It sounds like fun."

"It will be," Melanie said, looping her arm through Ava's and heading toward the pool.
