

The South Dunedin Street Festival is back for another year, in autumn rather than spring, hoping to let people get out in Dunedin's great Autumn weather! The South Dunedin Street Festival aims to celebrate all things South Dunedin. The city's most diverse communities get together for a day of performances, fantastic food options and this year's festival will have a variety of zones, including extra spots for music, dance, fitness and DIY as well as the regular stage performances and stalls.

'This is a real opportunity for South Dunedin to come together and celebrate its richness and diversity,' co-convener Eleanor Doig says. "We want to acknowledge the incredible energy that there is in our community and invite everyone to be a part of it. There are so many good things happening in South Dunedin at the moment and we want to encourage people to be positive and active. "

The Festival is centred on the community and people being proud, self-motivated and self-sufficient. It focuses on what the community does, who we are and where we are from. "It's not something that somebody else is doing for South Dunedin, it's what South Dunedin is doing for itself." Eleanor Doig says the festival would give "space and voice" to businesses, individuals, clubs and organisations to show off their particular skills and talents.

With the focus all on South Dunedin, there will be plenty of things to keep the whole family - from Nanna and Granddad to children - entertained.
